

P.G. County paid $3.4 million to anti-gay religious group

School system rented building from Bishop Harry Jackson, who fought marriage in D.C., Md.

By LOU CHIBBARO JR.
lchibbaro@washblade.com

A Beltsville, Md.-based religious organization headed by Bishop Harry Jackson, who led campaigns to oppose same-sex marriage laws in D.C. and Maryland, received more than $3.4 million in rental income over a five-year period from the Prince George's County Public Schools.

Under terms established in two leases, the P.G. County Public Schools rented 35,000 square feet of office space from September 2007 to August 2012 in an office building at 6251 Ammendale Road in Beltsville. The Blade obtained copies of the leases through a Maryland Public Information Act request.

P.G. County land records show that the building is owned by Christian Hope Ministries, Inc., for which Jackson serves as president. The building is also home to Hope Christian Church, where Jackson serves as pastor.

Briant Coleman, a spokesperson for P.G. County Public Schools, said the decision to rent office space at the Ammendale Road building was made by the school system's former superintendent, John Deasy, who currently serves as superintendent of the Los Angeles Public School System.

Coleman said neither he nor the P.G. schools' current superintendent, Alvin Crawley, know why Deasy selected the office building owned by Christian Hope Ministries other than that the building and rental agreement met the school system's criteria for doing business with a vendor.

"Based on the best and final offer, we would make a determination as to whether or not a vendor can provide services we need and whether or not it was the most reasonable price available," Coleman said.

Deasy, who left the P.G. Public Schools in 2008, didn't immediately respond to a call and email sent to his Los Angeles office.

Jackson also didn't return a call or respond to an email seeking comment this week.

Jackson and Deasy each signed the two

HARRY JACKSON became a prominent activist opposing marriage equality in Maryland and D.C. A building owned by his church was paid $3.4 million in rent by P.G. County schools.

WASHINGTON BLADE FILE PHOTO BY MICHAEL KEY

CONTINUES ON PAGE 14

'Tis the Season

From the Nutcracker to Sharon Needles, there's a holiday show for all tastes around town.

PAGE 31

Black Friday

As shoppers swarm stores this weekend, check out part one of our annual Holiday Gift Guide.

PAGE 23

A home for Norman

D.C. couple finalizes family in 'Adoption Day' program

By JOEY DiGUGLIELMO
joeyd@washblade.com

Norman Moore loves "Dora the Explorer," playing Legos and macaroni and cheese.

"Give him those, and he'd be just fine," his dad, Chad Copeland, says.

His other dad, Scooter Ward, calls Norman, 5, "quite an actor" and "a big ham."

He also, "likes to be a teacher," Ward says. "Loves to show you how to do something."

The three of them, together since Norman was placed with them as a foster son in January 2011, became a permanent family unit last weekend when Judge Lee Satterfield of D.C. Superior Court signed their adoption decree. Of the 34 children adopted last weekend in D.C., five were to gay male couples.

"It's ceremonial but also a legal proceeding," Copeland, 36, a D.C. assistant attorney general, says. "Each family and child is called up and you go up with any close friends or family you have with you and a small speech is made."

Ward says it was an emotional end to a very long process.

"I was kind of thinking beforehand, 'Oh, it's no big deal, he's been with us almost two years, blah blah blah, but then about an hour into it, I started to get pretty emotional," he says. "I started to really think about how long the journey has been and even though it's been relatively smooth in a lot of ways, it's also been very hard in some ways as well. There were many points along the way where things came up that could have changed the outcome, so knowing we've overcome all that was really amazing."

CONTINUES ON PAGE 16

D.C. gay couple finalizes adoption of son

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 1

For his part, Norman, who calls Copeland "Dad" and Ward "Pops," says he was "happy when the lady called my name." He also says he "got lots of goodies."

Copeland and Ward have a D.C. domestic partnership. They met at a Human Rights Campaign fundraiser in Dallas, where they formerly lived (though neither are from Texas). They've been together almost seven years and have lived together about five years. After starting their relationship in Texas, Ward moved to Washington for a job in 2006. Copeland followed in 2007. Copeland is adopted himself, so they talked fairly early in their relationship about the possibility of adopting.

Working with D.C.'s Child and Family Services Agency, the couple took a licensing course and within about four months, Norman came to live with them. He had been born in D.C. but the couple declines to go into details about his biological family or situation.

"He was just a pretty normal kid who was in a situation where he could not be cared for the way he needed to be," Copeland says.

Although there were some long nights and an inevitable adjustment period for everyone, the couple says for the most part, it "just clicked."

"We were extremely tired," Ward says. "We'd both been kind of extreme night owls before and we'd suddenly have family and friends calling us at, like, 10 at night and we'd be ready for bed ... but in many ways it was a very organic change."

Ward, 35, took a few weeks off from his job as a project manager for a D.C.-based software company, but Norman had already been in preschool, so neither parent had to give up his career.

Both say their being gay was never an issue in the adoption.

Copeland says he knew from his legal work — he'd worked on cases involving anti-gay Maryland minister Rev. Harry Jackson who'd sued the District — that D.C.'s Human Rights Act of 1977 is solid.

"I fully understood the breadth of protection that exists within the law," he says. "I didn't anticipate a problem and we never once had a single problem."

Ward says he was bracing himself just in case.

"As a bi-racial gay couple, I kind of expected there to be a different layer there or something, some level of strife, but we never had any problems at all. It was almost a bit of a let down — I wanted to be advocate for something, but that says a lot of great things about where we live that it wasn't."

There was a chance early on, that Norman may have returned to his biological family.

"That's usually the initial goal in a foster care situation," Copeland says. "It would have been very hard because he really is just the sweetest little boy and it was very easy to just get so attached to him. There were certainly moments where we may never have made it to adoption, but our social workers were always there to help us understand the next steps."

The couple praises the D.C. staff they worked with throughout — social workers LaTasha McKinley and Sarah McDonald and also Mallory Martin of the Children's Law Center who acted on Norman's behalf.

It all sounds so perfect — surely there were some struggles for the new family, right?

The couple says the hardest part was the element of so much being unknown at the outset.

"We were just foster parents for a long time," Ward says. "We had no idea what the next court hearing could bring. There was a lot of pandering and stress and emotion and I don't want to discount that. There's a lot of emotion tied to it."

But it did all work out. The family is in Dallas this week for Thanksgiving with Ward's family. Copeland's family is in his native Louisiana and both say their respective parents were quick to welcome Norman as a grandchild.

"He does everything here he's not allowed to do at home, which is just how it should be at your grandparents' house," Ward says with a chuckle.

On Tuesday this week, Norman spent the day hanging out with "Nana," Ward's mother. This wasn't his first plane ride, Copeland has to remind him. His favorite time in Texas so far has been playing with his cousin, Erica. They'll have Thanksgiving dinner Thursday at Uncle Tim's.

Since same-sex marriage is legal in Washington, the couple may eventually wed. They have no immediate plans to, though, and say that wasn't an issue in the process nor would it have been had they been a straight couple.

Norman is in kindergarten and attends a charter school in D.C.

The couple says he's doing great overall and they're often amused by, as Ward puts it, his "amazing level of innocence."

"He's very happy to have a home," Copeland says. "He loves us and is a very sweet and happy boy. Happy is the right word in some ways, but it's also an insufficient word because there are so many more emotions attached to it. You realize you've contributed to something bigger. This little boy had so many obstacles in his path. It's all just sort of humbling and overwhelming at the same time."

SCOOTER WARD (left), CHAD COPELAND and their son, NORMAN MOORE with Judge NOEL JOHNSON at an adoption day proceeding last weekend in D.C. Superior Court.

WASHINGTON BLADE PHOTO BY MICHAEL KEY

Gay parents, kids participate in 'Adoption Day'

Relatives and friends wept in joy and cheered as at least four gay male couples carried or walked with their children to a stage at the D.C. Superior Court on Saturday, Nov. 17, where judges signed papers finalizing the adoption of their kids.

With D.C. Mayor Vincent Gray and a contingent of family court judges, social workers, and lawyers looking on, the gay couples joined at least 25 straight couples or single parents who had their children's adoptions finalized during the city's 26th Annual Adoption Day ceremony.

"The ceremony is designed to celebrate the joy of adoption and encourage area residents to consider adopting or fostering a child in the District's public child welfare system," said a statement released by the Superior Court and the D.C. Child and Family Services Agency, which facilitates adoptions in the city.

Among the couples participating in the ceremony were Reginald Wilson and his husband Wesley McCammon, who recently moved from Mississippi to the D.C. area, where they adopted Reginald Jr., 9, and his biological sister, Regina, 10.

As the family was introduced by the ceremony's emcee, NBC News 4 anchor Barbara Harrison, Wilson wept uncontrollably, saying later he was overcome by joy at the culmination of his and his husband's dream of becoming a family with children.

Gray, who was sitting nearby, walked over to Wilson and hugged him. About a half hour earlier, the mayor delivered remarks praising the city's adoption program and expressing support for D.C.'s longstanding policy of allowing same-sex couples to adopt.

"We've come to an age of enlightenment where, of course, we recognize traditional families and hope that they will adopt," Gray said. "But also single adults ought to be considered for adoption because they make wonderful adoptive families," he told the gathering. "And frankly, I'm proud to be in a city where we have approved marriage equality and we have some of the most loving families in the city who are same-sex couples."

Also participating in the ceremony were D.C. residents Chad Copeland and Kevin "Scooter" Ward and their adopted son Norman, 5; and Silvio Weisner and his husband Jeffrey Weisner and their 10-month-old adopted daughter Madeleine Susannah Weisner.

"She was born just outside of Houston, Texas, and we were there on the day she was born," Silvio Weisner told the Blade. "We brought her home to D.C. nine days later."

Judith Sandalow, executive director of the D.C.-based Children's Law Center, which provides legal services to people seeking to adopt or become foster parents, said the city's Child and Family Services Agency routinely approves gay people and same-sex couples as foster or adoptive parents.

She said anyone interested in learning more about how to adopt or become a foster parent should contact the agency at 202-671-LOVE or go its adoption/foster care website, adoptdckids.org.

LOU CHIBBARO JR.